As part of Adobe's general migration to native APIs, product teams migrated the majority of their Photoshop APIs to native on macOS 10.14 and Windows 10. The primary API changes are:

- Graphics APIs: Copying pixels is slow and resource-intensive. The new Photoshop APIs use a per-thread vector primitive to move information quickly. Pixel information is resampled into a fast Python vector primitive. This makes copying pixels around the canvas take approximately one-thousandth of the time.
- Image datasets: The old photo library API is deprecated. Photoshop now provides an image server so that all new files go to the server before being sent to the canvas.
- Native file format: The new Photoshop has a new image file format. The old format is called PSD, but this is deprecated. Photoshop now uses EXR. In addition, Photoshop now has a native version of both PDF and EPS files. Software that uses these file formats can use native Photoshop files as an output. Photoshop CC has native exports for both.PNG and.PDF, so they can be used as output files for other software that does not support Photoshop native Exports.
- Graphic Layers: All new layers are composite layers. A layer has an alpha channel and a color channel. Color channels vary for different editing modes. The canvas is divided into composite layers that contain pixels of different layers.

Photoshop has a command line utility, Photoshop Shell, which lets you open various files with custom settings. Examine document and photo layouts, change layers, basic effects, and even put smart objects on the clipboard. Photoshop's built-in file managers also let you drag and drop images or files into your project quickly.
