The MEDICAL GENERAL ASSOCIATION EVALUATION OF: ___ is in order. ABSTRACT: Blood grouping is the study of the compatibility of the ABO system in human beings. The ABO system consists of a complex series of agglutinating substances produced by red blood cells and antibody produced by lymphocytes. Red Blood Cells The blood group system is an antigenic system. Each type of red blood cell (RBC) possesses a particular antigen or determinant, and the antigens are composed of molecules with specific chemical structures. RBC antigens are specified by a single gene, the ABO gene, which determines the major antigen of the blood group. For example, a person with blood type O has an antigen (OK) on the red blood cell surface. If another person has a different gene, that gene determines the RBC antigens that this person has. For example, a person with blood type AB has an antigen (OK) on the red blood cell surface and a different antigen (ABO) on the surface. The inheritance of different blood group antigens and the formation of anti- antigens are based on two mechanisms: 1. The process of antigen synthesis on the surface of a red blood cell occurs when red blood cells are maturing in the bone marrow.
